

I know this is a difficult time for us all. We miss our kids. We worry about the needs of our students being met, both academically and emotionally, because that's who we are as educators. This isn't just a job, it's a career choice, because we know we make a difference. We also miss each other. Even though we are in trying times, we will grow and learn new ways to communicate, relate and respond with the professionalism that is imbedded in our profession. We will rise further than we ever have before from this crisis and become a force to be reckoned with for our kids, together.
